ANYONE traveling between the North and the South should be interested in the advantages of the route via Savannah. The city, ancient in date, but pulsating with current activity and fully abreast of the times, was founded by James Oglethorpe, in 1733, and is situated on a bluff on the right bank of the Savannah River, about 18 miles from the ocean. The increase in population during the last decade is a surprise to those who are not familiar with the liberal policy adopted by the transportation lines centering at Savannah.

The HOTEL DE SOTO, which was opened last year, has supplied the long-felt need for a hotel on a par with the far-famed Ponce de Leon, at St. Augustine.

Forsyth Park, the Historical Society, the Telfair Academy of Fine Arts, the historic monuments, the drives over shell roads to the Isle of Hope and to Thunderbolt, and Bonaventure, the picturesque and weird cemetery, shaded by immense live oaks, in cathedral-like aisles, festooned with Spanish moss, are all objects of interest, which will well repay a sojourn at Savannah. The city is supplied with clear artesian water, and is well lighted by electricity. Street cars render easy of access all points of interest.

WITH the exception of New Orleans, Savannah exports more cotton than any other port in the world. The immense naval-store yards are indicative of the business in rosin and turpentine, making it the first port in the world in these products, and the shipping along the miles of water front testify to the importance of the lumber trade. Pig iron, the new product of Alabama, Tennessee and Georgia, finds a market in the North through Savannah. Naturally, those engaged in the production and shipment of these staples receive through the same channels the importations and manufactures of the North. The consequent tide of travel and shipment, continuous in one direction or the other the year round, has led the
